Strike Averted: Longshoremen, USMX Reach Tentative Agreement on All Terms

The International Longshoremen's Association (ILA) and the United States Maritime Alliance (USMX) announced a tentative agreement on a new six-year contract. Both parties described the deal as a "win-win," addressing the final contentious issue of automation. The agreement reportedly protects current ILA jobs while establishing a framework to implement new technologies, such as semi-automated rail-mounted gantry cranes, that will create new jobs and modernize ports, enhancing safety and efficiency. The current contract will remain in effect until ILA and USMX members review the tentative terms and ratify the new agreement.

The tentative agreement comes just six days before a second ILA strike was set to take place on January 15, 2025. A three-day strike took place in October, which caused a surge in shipping prices and cargo backlogs at 36 ports on the East and Gulf Coasts. The longshoremen then returned to work after employers agreed to a 62% wage increase over six years, tabling automation-related terms until January 2025.
