OVERVIEW

Will focuses his practice on mass tort and product liability matters.

With many family members in the legal field, Will was drawn to law from a young age but first pursued a career in journalism and web development. However, the global shake-ups caused by COVID-19 persuaded him to enroll in law school: it was the perfect time for a career shift, and he anticipated significant changes in the industry.

Will's prior career provides him with a different perspective on his legal practice. As a journalist, he enjoyed diving deep into new topics, learning how things work, and interviewing key figures. This curiosity translates well to his role with the Mass Tort & Product Liability team, where he loves learning about clients' products and the science behind them. Meanwhile, his web development experience honed his creativity and problem-solving skills, both of which are invaluable in the legal field.

During law school, Will was particularly drawn to classes on privacy, data, and international law. He enjoyed the intellectual challenge these subjects presented and the opportunities they provided to learn about different cultures and legal systems. He was equally enthusiastic about the litigation process, with the competitive thrill of trial. Will also served as a summer associate at the firm, conducting research on California civil procedure and international treaty projects.

Known for his dedication and creative problem-solving, Will is committed to providing the best service possible to clients.
